Pashman Stein Walder Hayden attorney Sean Mack quoted in NJBiz article, “A court ruling sharpens the debate over workplace rules and medical marijuana.” The article explains how New Jersey employers will not be able to terminate an employee for testing positive for THC if they’re a medical marijuana patient.

“Employers had hoped for a bright line that if someone tested positive for marijuana, they could be terminated,” said Sean Mack, partner at Pashman Stein Walder Hayden in Holmdel.

“What this case says is if you’re using it for medical purposes, then employers in New Jersey can’t take that position.”
